

AFP assists in democratic elections in Mozambique

NEWSPAPER reports that members of the first AFP Mozambique contingent were forced to get their drinking water from toilets proved to be wrong, but other aspects reported about the dismal working and living conditions endured by these officers were spot on.

The first contingent returned to Australia on September 19 with the rough weather conditions dogging them all the way from Johannesburg. The Canberra members of the contingent finally touched down at 6pm, three hours later than anticipated.

Having left Australia on March 24 their peacekeeping mission on behalf of the United Nations was to aid civil authorities in restoring law and order to an infrastructure that had broken down during civil war. With Mozambique elections scheduled for late October, the AFP members commanded by Superintendent Bob Bradley joined the UN forces to assist local authorities to maintain order.

Unlike previous UN duty, on this tour the Australian contingent was split into pairs and given a variety of jobs and assigned to UN positions in Beira, Lichinga, Gurue, Tete, Nampula, Xai Xai, Inhambane, Maputo and Matola.

Second Contingent

The second contingent to Mozambique left Australia on September 1, laden with gifts for the people of the war-torn country.

Taking over the duties of the first contingent, they were able to take with them 15,000 items of leisure wear carrying counterfeit brand names which had been confiscated by the AFP's Western Region in 1991.

Licenses of the authentic trademarks gave permission for the disposal of the goods in this way rather than having the items destroyed.

The clothing, sunglasses and shoes bore imitations of popular brand names such as Esprit, Reebok, Jag, and Bolle.

Along with the confiscated items, the contingent took 10 complete swing sets donated by Hills Industries Ltd to be distributed among schools.

Getting on with the job

The role of the first contingent was to assist in the re-establishment of the rule of law and assist with the peaceful progress to the October elections. The second contingent arrived to build on this role and to ensure the election-eering period and polling days ran as smoothly as possible.

Reports from the contingent OIC, Superintendent Geoff Hazel, indicate that the second contingent arrived to similar living conditions and operating difficulties to the first contingent.

The work of monitoring local police activities and investigation human rights violations continued, and the activities of disgruntled demobbed soldiers continued to be of concern.

Members of the second contingent experienced similar health problems to the first contingent; malaria and intestinal problems being common ailments. Regardless of these conditions, Superintendent Hazel was able to commend the work being done by the second contingent.

While the election period brought its own set of problems, during this time there was a marked decline in political killings and bombings.

With the elections behind them, the members of the second contingent were able to turn their attention to winding up the UN presence in Mozambique and are looking forward to returning to Australia in mid December.

Met by a proud Commissioner

When meeting the Canberra-based members of the first contingent on their return on September 19, Commissioner Palmer said he was very proud of the officers who had made a significant contribution to the United Nations peacekeeping effort.

"I am proud to be a part of a team of officers who can apply such diversity of policing skills under what must have been arduous and testing conditions.

"I must make mention of the family members who gave such tremendous support to their husbands and fathers and through their own sacrifice, have enable Australia to do its duty on the international scene," he said.

The members of the second contingent received a similar welcome home by senior officers of Eastern and ACT Regions.

Cyprus

Queensland Police host Cyprus reunion

By Tracey Dickerson

THE 30th reunion of United Nations Civilian Police (UNCIVPOL) in Cyprus was celebrated in Brisbane in late October 1994, and by all accounts it was a huge success.

The Queensland Police hosted the reunion and the Queensland weather certainly lived up to all expectations and made the outdoor events all the more enjoyable.

AFP Sergeant Ross Crafter was one of many who were miked up and spoke to camera of their Cyprus experiences.

Opportunities existed on Cyprus for the Australian police which did not arise during the normal course of duties in their home State jurisdictions. Sergeant Ross Crafter talked about the swimming lessons the Aussie police conducted for UN children during his time in Cyprus.

“We taught about 30 kids to swim. By the time they had finished most of them were able to swim right across the pool and a couple even went on to get their bronze medallion and silver star. It was a great feeling being able to use our spare time to the greatest advantage,” he said.
